What is Copyright?

As the author of your thesis or dissertation, only you are legally entitled to authorize publication or reproduction of your intellectual property, although you may assign your rights to others.

Copyright protection comes into being automatically, as soon as you put an original work in tangible form. YOU ARE NOT REQUIRED TO PAY A FEE, INCLUDE A SPECIAL NOTICE ON YOUR WORK, OR REGISTER YOUR COPYRIGHT TO SECURE COPYRIGHT PROTECTION. However, you may wish to register or put a notice on your work in order to make your claim obvious. Registering a copyright gives you the right to sue for damages if someone infringes it.

Your copyright gives you the exclusive right to print, reprint, copy, and sell your work and to prepare derivative works based on the copyrighted work. There are, however, limitations on your exclusive right:

Others may excerpt small portions of your thesis for scholarly work or research without obtaining your permission, provided the borrowing is “fair use.” Of course, they must credit you as the source. Any borrowing beyond this “fair use” can only be done with your permission. Fair use is defined in U.S. Code Title 17, Section 107.

As part of your thesis submission process, you will be required to allow Thomas Jefferson University and ProQuest UMI some special permissions:

1. You are required to give Thomas Jefferson University the royalty-free non-exclusive right to store and to make single copies of your thesis in multiple formats, for nonprofit purposes such as preservation. A non-exclusive right extends a privilege without giving up your own right to control your work. Jefferson will not “own” your thesis or your copyright.

2. If you are required to deposit a copy of your thesis with ProQuest UMI, you must also give the company a non-exclusive right to store and sell copies of your thesis in multiple formats, and to reproduce and distribute your abstract in any format in whole or in part. ProQuest will not “own” your thesis or your copyright; the company will also pay you royalties in return for the privilege.

Copyright Page

While a copyright notice is no longer required by law to be placed on the work, it is the most obvious way to state your claim, and you are advised to include it. Place the copyright notice on all copies of your thesis on the page following the signature page, using one of the standard formats:
Registration

You may choose to copyright your manuscript by including the copyright notice but not formally registering your copyright. However, to fully protect your rights in a copyright dispute and to be eligible for damages caused by infringement, you must formally register your work with the Copyright Office of the Library of Congress.

Registration is a legal process which makes a public record of your copyright. If you can foresee taking someone to court for using your work unlawfully, for example, if you have developed a separately marketable item such as a testing scale, computer program, or other item that might require protection, you should register your copyright. If you decide to register the copyright of your thesis, you may either apply directly to the Copyright Office of the Library of Congress, or request ProQuest UMI to register the work on your behalf.

Instructions for direct registration with the Library of Congress are available at http://www.copyright.gov/register/literary.html. The current fee for registration is $45 and you will be required to submit two printed copies of your work. You will receive a certificate of registration.

If you are depositing a copy of your thesis with ProQuest, you may pay ProQuest to file the registration on your behalf. ProQuest will complete the application form and file it, together with the registration fee and required deposit copies of your thesis with the Copyright Office.

You may register your copyright at any time within its term. Current copyright law defines the term as life of the author plus 70 years.

The Role of ProQuest UMI

Thomas Jefferson’s relationship with ProQuest UMI dates back many years to when the University agreed to allow the company to distribute microfilm copies of Jefferson doctoral theses. The University has maintained the relationship because it believes that knowledge should be disseminated to the public as widely as possible, and that ProQuest’s Dissertation Abstracts service is a primary method to do so.

ProQuest pays a royalty of 10% on sales of copies of the dissertation for any calendar year when royalty payments exceed $10. ProQuest may use third party agencies to collect orders for dissertations, but ProQuest fills the orders. Dissertation authors retain all rights to their dissertations, and sales are tracked for royalty payments.
Theses submitted to ProQuest also appear in the Jefferson Digital Commons, Thomas Jefferson University’s institutional repository, where they will be freely available to Jefferson students and faculty. Members of the public will be able to search and view the first 24 pages of your thesis, but must pay ProQuest to obtain a full copy.

Materials Copyrighted by Others

You do not need permission to use works in the public domain, i.e., works on which a copyright never existed and those on which the copyright has expired; however, you must properly acknowledge such works.

If you use copyrighted works, you must not only acknowledge the source, but unless such use falls within the doctrine of “fair use”, you may not include the material without the written permission of the copyright holder. For an overview of copyright law and fair use as it applies to master's theses and doctoral dissertations, see the manual Copyright Law & Graduate Research: New Media, New Rights, and Your Dissertation (http://www.umi.com/products_umi/dissertations/copyright/) by Kenneth D. Crews, and available from ProQuest.

If your borrowing exceeds fair use, for example, if you quote extensively from another source or if you borrow an entire creation such as a photograph or a testing scale, you must secure written permission.

In addition to faculty review, ProQuest will review your thesis for use of copyrighted material. If they find copyrighted material in your thesis without documentation of permission from the copyright holder, they will write to you to request a letter of permission:

- If you fail to obtain permission for ProQuest to film and sell this material, ProQuest will delete the material in question when producing copies for sale to the public.
- If you request a letter of permission, be sure the grantor is aware that the work is to be published through ProQuest’s doctoral dissertation program; that is, the holder must also grant ProQuest the authorization for reproduction.
- If you own the copyright to the previously copyrighted material, a letter to that effect from you to ProQuest will suffice.

You are solely responsible if you violate the copyright law; neither the University nor ProQuest will be held liable.

Classified Materials and Sequestering

You may not use any information that is restricted or cannot be disseminated to the public in your thesis, since one of the primary intents of the thesis effort is to communicate the results of the thesis authors’ research to the scholarly community.
